Why this? Because this is the British National Short Course championship, and we all know how I feel about the lack of success that's been had in the British short course championship since I worked for the BBC in the 1980's. I'm also doing a book on The Masters and Short Course Championships, and the lack of diversity is something I've been asking for for years, so this is my way of raising the profile of the Short Courses. In a separate thread, I intend to show some highlights from a race, rather than trying to get all of them onto the board in one go, and I've got a file with some of the highlights from the old GTP races on the M30. Easier said than done. I get the impression that this isn't exactly the best track for the open class. At the time, the M42 was the more famous short course but I found the Nurburgring to be much easier and the big straight a lot nicer to drive as opposed to the M42's one-and-a-bit tight chicane. On the other hand, it is a long course (probably too long if the track's been resurfaced) with a lot of elevation changes and it's a very fast track - and I think that's what makes it very tricky for cars with less downforce. I can appreciate the point you make, DSB, but as far as I can tell, the only difference is that there are no markings in the middle of the track. That doesn't make it any different from the M42. The main difference seems to be that the very middle of the track is a straight. Now it may well be that if you take off the markers that you can't tell where the corners end and the straight begin, but I still think it's a shorter course than the M42. That is not the case. The Nurburgring has the same number of corners as M42. We actually stand on the same ground as M42. The only difference is that it's a bit less twisty. The Hockenheimring is more twisty and the track is wider than Nurburgring but the total distance is the same. As was already stated in the other thread, Nurburgring has just one straight whereas Hockenheimring has 3. Nurburgring has some elevation changes whereas Hockenheimring does not. But not much.
